

Shared Copyright Framework

The Scattered Pelican

The Scattered Pelican is committed to upholding utmost respect for the intellectual rights and property of all its contributors and keeps this practice well-aligned with its decolonial approach, open-access model, and public access copyleft tendencies (in the field of knowledge). To this end, The Scattered Pelican has devised a "Shared Copyright Framework" in which the journal keeps the "original" rights of publication, but unlike many other journals it does not keep "exclusive" rights. The main features of "Shared Copyright" are as follows:

1. Before publication, the author confirms that the rights to the accepted article have not been granted elsewhere (no simultaneous submissions or publications). The journal keeps the right to be the first and original publisher of the manuscript.
2. Any article accepted in the initial desk screening will have a temporary "exclusive copyright" status during peer reviewing process. If later rejected, the copyright completely returns to the author; if accepted for final publication, the "exclusive copyright" status extends during the production process. This is only to ensure that the journal remains the original publisher of the article. After the publication of the article in the journal, the temporary "exclusive rights" turn into the particular "shared copyright" model.
3. The shared copyright article is automatically a publication under the "Creative Commons" license of CC BY-SA 4.0 where both the journal and the author(s) must be attributed. Authors can voluntarily opt out of the ShareAlike feature of the license, but not during the first two years of publication, as it will not be agreed on by The Scattered Pelican as the shared copyright holder.
4. Any subsequent requests to publish the article, in whole or in part, in any book, journal, or electronic medium, should be consulted with the journal The Scattered Pelican must be named as the original publisher, except in instances wherein educational institutions request access for non-commercial or classroom use.
5. If the author revises the article to the extent that more than 40% of the content is changed and revised, or more than 30% of the amount of the original content is added and improved, the author does not need to refer to The Scattered Pelican as a copyright holder anymore, it can be used and published at the discretion of the author, and the only attribution to the journal is as the publisher of the original (earlier) version. However, even the newer version, as long as it bears the same central thesis, title, and arguments, must never be used for commercial purposes.
